Passion and Gratitude in Psychoanalysis

William J. Coburn, Ph.D. and Psy.D.

To paraphrase one of Samuel Clemens' admittedly ragged quips, rumors of the balkanization, marginalization, and impending demise of psychoanalysis may have been somewhat exaggerated. Perhaps psychoanalysis doesn't need a life coach after all. If the contents of this journal since its inception six years ago, along with those of other lively, contemporary publications such as Psychoanalytic Dialogues, Contemporary Psychoanalysis, and Psychoanalytic Psychology, are any indication, the diagnosis of fractionation given to psychoanalysis (which insurance wouldn't have covered anyway) turns out to be a serious case of cross-fertilization of inspiring, evocative, and creative ideas—ideas birthed both from psychoanalytic pioneers and the contemporary midwives who still value originality, invention, context, passion, and an appreciation for the irreducibility of the person. The cry for evidence-based treatments seems not to be deterring psychoanalysts and their respective patients from enjoying the discovery of their own personal odysseys; they continue to expand their sense of emotional meaning and deepen their connections and engagements with others, while still getting around to reducing troublesome symptoms from time to time as well.

If contemporary psychoanalysis has diverged from traditional scientism, or even challenged it at times, it bodes well for patients and clinicians who favor respecting the integrity of the unique emotional lives of persons, many of whom struggle daily to wrest themselves from the encumbrances of the one-size-fits-all, empirical-data based prejudices of normativity. And indeed, the question of who determines what constitutes “evidence” remains underexplored. And the voices of our patients often go unheard. Doubtless psychoanalysis, given its intense diversification of theories and sensibilities, could have Dodo-like perished in its tracks by now. But its continuing success strangely may lie in psychoanalysis' recognition that, indeed, each analysand, each person, is utterly unique and individual, each requiring a different clinical sensibility to reap the rewards of a therapeutic relationship. Thus, given our current contextualist and systems understanding of human life—paradoxically having emerged from the science that reluctantly but finally gave a nod to chaos, noise, anomaly, and messiness—the notion of settling on one treatment with one identifiable and predesigned outcome, for all patients, has come to feel, well, rather embarrassing.

If there is a new paradigm brewing in psychoanalysis, and there usually is, it is one characterized not as much by a different vision of the self, or by a reconceptualization of the clinical relationship—though there is plenty of that—but rather by the increasing respect of psychoanalytically informed clinicians for the uniqueness of the individual, whether philosophically, psychologically, or neurobiologically speaking, and the consequent and relentless necessity for ready-to-hand creativity and ingenuity. Clinicians' awareness, toleration, and dare I say excitement about multiple perspectives—the proverbial jigsaw puzzle with the customary missing pieces—provide the engine for appreciating and respecting the complexity of each individual's emotional world. Clinicians today seem more willing to live and play with ideas, and less given to the familiar chant: “I don't want to have to think—just tell me what to do with this theory.” I am encountering less preoccupation with finding a psychoanalytic common ground on which we presumably could stand, assured and calmed in the knowledge of one coherent theory: Indeed, unification, homogeneity, and consensus make me squeamish, especially when it comes to things like theory and practice.

I believe the pages of the IJPSP in the last five years reflect the fruits of the diverse opinion, argument, cross-pollination, creativity, and passion that are palpable in psychoanalysis today. My experience as this journal's editor continues to be enlivening, evocative, mind-addling, and uplifting. When I study the articles that find residence on my desk, I am, above all, inspired, for which I am grateful. I feel privileged to be able to witness, first hand, the evolution of psychoanalytic sensibilities that are, indeed, therapeutic—sensibilities that are shaping our future. That said, I remain convinced that the true life blood of the IJPSP rests, in addition to the contributing authors, in two essential groups of terrific people: The IJPSP editorial organization—our associate editors, our contributing editors, our book review editor, our neuroscience editors, our philosophy editors, our poetry editors, our internet editor, our editorial board, and our editorial associate (all listed on our masthead)—and our editorial reviewers and translators (listed below). Without them, without their indefatigable tenacity and focus, our efforts could not be realized. I wish to extend to them my heartfelt appreciation and gratitude.

Reviewers:
- Lawrence Ballon
- Leonard Bearne
- Lisa Bialkin
- Margaret Black
- Ronald Bodansky
- Elena Bonn
- Kati Breckenridge
- R. Curtis Bristol
- Cheryl Brosig
- Doris Brothers
- Russell Carr
- Marcia Dobson
- Shelley Doctors
- Stan T. Dudley
- Amy H. Eldridge
- Elizabeth Feldman
- James M. Fisch
- Roger Frie
- James L. Fosshage
- Paula Fuqua
- Jill Gardner
- Richard Geist
- Giac Giacomantonio
- Martin W. Gossman
- Jacqueline Gotthold
- Arthur A. Gray
- Helen Grebow
- Ruth Gruenthal
- Janice Gump
- Hans-Peter Hartmann
- Roger Hastings
- Marie Hellinger
- Sandra Hershberg
- Bruce Herzog
- Marsha Hewitt
- Sally Howard
- Samuel O. Izenberg
- Silvia Janko
- Amy Joelson
- Jane Jones
- Christine C. Kieffer
- Sandra M. Kiersky
Alan R. Kindler
Steven Knoblauch
Amanda Kottler
Volker Kraft
Joan Lang
Susan G. Lazar
Lester Lenoff
Carla Leone
Holly Levenkron
Fred Levin
Louisa Livingston
Martin Livingston
Peter Maduro
Gabriela Mann
Jeffrey Mermelstein
Marilyn Metzl
Sheldon Meyers
Wolfgang Milch
Andrew P. Morrison
Kenneth M. Newman
Donna Orange
Anna Ornstein
Paul Ornstein
Sandra Palef
Michael Pariser
Stuart D. Perlman
Judith Pickles
Carol M. Press
Lynn Preston
Bruce Reis
Annette Richard
Philip A. Ringstrom
Gary Rodin
Jane Rubin
Judith Rustin
Susan H. Sands
Gordon Schulz
Barry Segal
Rosemary Segalla
David Shaddock
Estelle Shane
Sanford Shapiro
Ellen Shumsky
Alan Siegel